

The world's most slender skyscraper just opened on Billionaires' Row

Located on 111 West 57th Street, this landmark tower reigns above the Big Apple...

Words: Anna Galbraith

As the hottest property investment on the infamous Billionaires' Row, 111 West 57th Street has a unique position in New York.

With unparalleled 360-degree views of Central Park and Downtown Manhattan, and a new record as the most slender skyscraper in the world, it is certainly a cut above your average supertall luxury skyrise (as if there could ever be such a thing).

A musical history...

But it is not only the skyscraper's geography that makes it so special. The building is also a development built around and upon the original landmarked Steinway building designed in 1925 by Warren & Wetmore.

His Master Bath

As a result of its incredible heritage, 111 West 57th Street has allowed the bringing together of the best of New York City's pre-war Golden Age of architectural design, and the best of today's contemporary creativity in design innovation, engineering, and construction.

An elegant giant...

The tower of the skyscraper is a slender beacon rising to a soaring 1,428 feet (this means that it easily falls under the category of "supertall", which describes buildings measuring from 984 to 1,969 feet).

This slender giant has added a distinct addition to the New York skyline. In the words of Justin Davidson for New York Magazine, "it's practically calligraphic, it will glint on the skyline, thanks to a genuinely opulent exterior finished in terracotta and bronze."

A beautiful construction...

This façade of terra cotta, glass, and bronze filigree is another nod to the history of the building — harking back to the quality, materiality and details of historic New York towers, whilst also embracing the best in modern technology to push the limits of engineering and construction.
